

Project 1: Menu Redesign

The first project for Spring 2026 in Typography II, taught by Alice Lee, consisted of a comprehensive menu redesign for a local restaurant in Fayetteville, Arkansas. The main objective was to develop and apply principles of typographic hierarchy while refining attention to detail. The menu needed to reflect the restaurant's environment, kitchen, and culture, while accounting for multiple factors. As Lee emphasized, "Typography is king." The project required typographic choices that successfully conveyed the restaurant's brand, enhanced legibility, and supported sales.

The assignment allowed creative control over the menu's physical format, including decisions about size, pagination, binding, and special formatting or printing requirements. My classmates and I were introduced to the design lab's Rizo printer and its applications, such as laminating and acrylic etching. I appreciated becoming more familiar with the lab, as it expanded my understanding of available resources for future projects. Initially, I felt limited in my options, but as I explored the tools, new opportunities emerged. Experimenting with these resources allowed me to discover my preferences and approach to the design process.

Participants could select a restaurant from a provided list or propose an alternative. The menu redesign was required to address the entire menu, not just beverages or entrees. Visual elements could include illustrations, but photography was not permitted. The assignment mandated the use of two distinct typefaces and prohibited existing restaurant logos unless a new logo was designed. Any color palette was acceptable, and the brand could be visually re-envisioned as long as the target audience remained consistent.

The project consisted of five steps. The first step involved conducting research and creating a moodboard for the restaurant. To collect insights, I visited the restaurant in person with my sister and sampled the make-your-own-bowl and crab ragoons. The interior felt somewhat lacking in character, with blue walls, bright windows, and minimal decoration aside from a fishnet on the wall. I intended to design a menu that evoked the atmosphere of a well-resourced, family-owned restaurant, balancing a homely and sophisticated theme. My moodboard reflected my vision of the restaurant as if it were located in Hawaii, while stressing family and community.

The second step required developing three distinct design directions or key visuals, each sufficiently detailed to convey unique concepts and atmospheres. After peer review of each key visual, we proceeded to the third step: improving the selected key visual. This chosen direction was further developed into the menu design, with the moodboard serving as an inspiration and guide.

Step four involved revising the menu through multiple iterations, bringing me closer to my ideal design. I sought feedback from several peers before submitting my work. My focus was on allowing typography to play a more prominent role than illustrations. The illustration process reminded me of my previous work on the Diamond Line Magazine, although I rendered less detail in the interior designs compared to that project, reserving more intricate illustration for the cover.

The final step involved producing the finished product, which included printing, cutting, and constructing a paper fish as pop-up art. I overestimated my capacity to create the fish, and with more planning, I would have chosen different materials and techniques. Regardless of these challenges, I received positive feedback on the pop-up fish. Although it was not my original plan, the outcome provided important knowledge for future projects.

During the final critique, we welcomed Manuel Miranda, a graphic designer from New York City, as a guest. Miranda is the owner and lead designer at Manuel Miranda Practice (MMP), a studio specializing in visual communication systems for various audiences and contexts, with over 15 years of experience. He also serves as a mayor-appointed commissioner on New York City's Public Design Commission and as a senior critic in the MFA program at Yale School of Art. Learning that Miranda did not begin his career as a graphic design major was inspiring, as his progression from working with computers to publishing books demonstrated the multiple paths within the field. Although he initially visited for the Lunar New Year Fest hosted by the School of Art, we had the opportunity to view his work and receive his critique on our menus.

Following the critique, the class proceeded to step six: designing and compiling a process document that outlined my creative process and thoughts from start to finish. This document was intended to illustrate my workflow to the professor beyond simply submitting a final file. Although we submitted the file for potential revision after the critique, I intended to go further for my own development. Having never assembled a process document of this nature before, I was keen to undertake the task.

In creating this book, I approached the process as curating a personal document, incorporating my own words and artwork. I designed the covers, layout, format, and double gate, primarily for my own satisfaction and to overcome a period of creative block. I intend to keep a set of these books as a record of what I can accomplish through Christ.

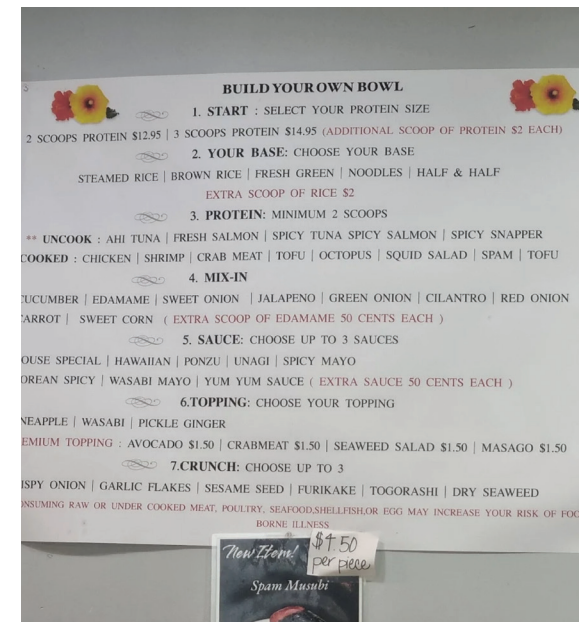

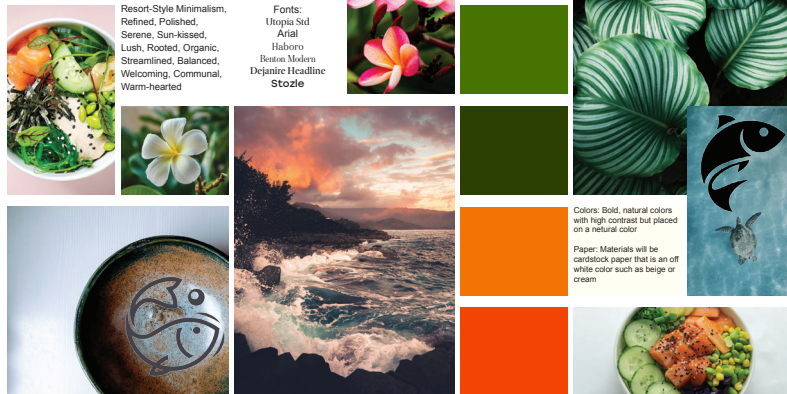

STEP 1: MOODBOARD

Redesign a menu for a local restaurant, and research and develop an 11" x 17" moodboard to guide the menu's visual direction. I chose Ohana Poke because I was craving raw fish, and I always tried Hawaiian restaurants in the area.

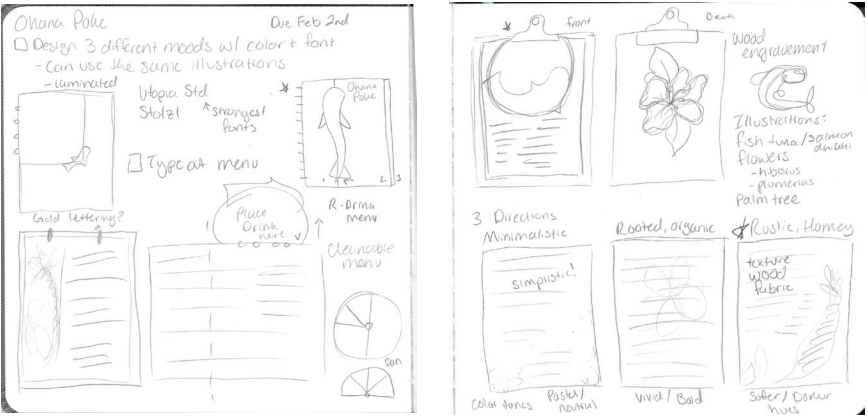

Ohana Poke

Hawaiian Cuisine

STEP 2: DEVELOP THREE KEY VISUALS

Develop three menu design directions based on the moodboard, featuring different colors, and encapsulate three different adjectives for each menu. Different formats were tested.

STEP 3: DEVELOP CHOSEN KEY VISUAL

Improve key visuals based on peers' feedback. After the feedback, I chose a stronger visual hierarchy out of the three key visuals to develop into the menu. The menu was typed and developed at this stage.

How to make a menu?

- Several theories + methods
- Mimic real-life menus, not just design

Standard Menu Structure

1. Header

- Restaurant Name
- Tagline or concept line
- Sometimes location or est. date

2. Sections (group logically)

- Starters / Appetizers
- Mains / Entrees
- Sides
- Desserts
- Drinks (often separate)

3. Item blocks

- Each item usually includes:

- Item name
- Brief description
- Price $$$

Type hierarchy?

- Restaurant name: Display
- Section headers: Bold
- Item names: Medium
- Descriptions: Light/regular
- Prices: same size as descriptions

STEP 4: REVISED MENU

Much consideration was given during the final project. I decided to change direction and use a lighter color palette while drawing plumeria flowers to fill the gaps. I have darkened the beige background since it was difficult to distinguish it from the white borders.

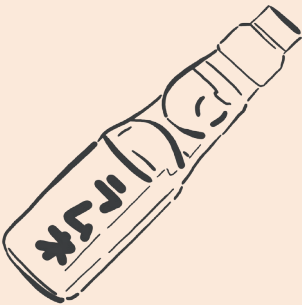

STEP 5: FINAL CRITIQUE

The day has come, and it went pretty well. I was glad I was able to make the fish (as best as I could) before presenting it to the class and our special guest speaker, Manuel Miranda.

STEP 5: FINAL CRITIQUE

Three final illustrations were made based on the items presented on the menu. Crab icons were added to items of the menu that contained crab meat. Each icon and illustration was colored and corrected in Adobe Photoshop, using a darker blue to avoid pure white and pure black.

STEP 5: FINAL CRITIQUE

My fish! I watched multiple videos on how to make a paper pop-up art with fish, but the resources were somewhat limited. So, I used the old construction paper I had and cut it according to the sketch I made at step 4.

I initially planned to have a menu held with a clipboard and a spiral-bound one on top for a flip-style layout. However, I noticed another classmate had a similar idea. I don't want it to feel like a copy, so I switched it to a pop-up menu instead. With more experimentation, I would add texture to the fish and maybe include information on matte lamination.

STEP 6: BE EXTRA

I made edits to the final critique of the Ohana Poke menu based on Manuel Miranda's feedback. I opted not to recraft the fish, but I do want to have a sample of glossy and matte lamination. I do think now that I have crafted the final product, I can make the decision for future projects.

This book began as a class assignment to document my thinking throughout Project 1: Menu Redesign. Once I met the original requirements, I revised and expanded the content to better showcase my voice and creative style. Typefaces Stolzl and Dejanire Headline were used for the text. The book was printed at the University of Arkansas School of Art and hand-bound with a pamphlet stitch. I completed this project on February 20, 2026, and printed it on February 23, 2026.
